MY PROGRAMME COMMITMENTS IN ACTION AND THE IMPORTANCE OF WOMEN’S PROFESSIONAL ALLIANCES AND UNITY

Participating in the programme gave me an energy boost and made me feel bold. After the programme, I was tasked to organize a large conference. Although resources were limited, I successfully lobbied for the support required from my upper boss to put a team together. The conference turned out to be an excellent success. Afterwards I sent a thank you message to all those who had contributed, and copied my upper boss. She came back with her own response, thanking everyone and specifically recognizing my leadership and commitment. This became a good example of the support that women can give to one another in the workplace.

Lately, I have begun to deliver on one of my commitments from the programme: to put together a peer group of women to advance our professional objectives. I have drafted the ToR, invited a group of female colleagues to participate in peer-to-peer exchanges. I’ve also continued mentoring younger female peers as part of my ongoing commitment to women’s economic empowerment.

Last year, I participated in another women’s leadership training affiliated with a prominent university. When I compare the two courses, as a technical professional working on gender related issues, I consider the UNSSC training programme to be better. The organisers found the right balance between theory and practice. I hope there will be opportunities to bring the programme to Asia and the Pacific and have suggested this to ESCAP and to the Thematic Working Group on gender equality and empowerment of women.

In conclusion, I feel strongly about the importance and benefit of being strong allies among women – and the Leadership Women and the UN Programme is effective in reinforcing this message.
